NIJ-2010-2428: Evaluation of Programs to Reduce Gang Membership, Crime and Violence

The National Institute of Justice (NIJ), Office of Justice Programs (OJP), U.S. Dept. of Justice (DOJ), is soliciting applications for funding to evaluate intervention and prevention programs aimed at reducing gang membership, criminal activity, and violence. This program seeks to conduct process and outcome evaluations on programs aimed at reducing gang membership and gang-related crime and violence for both adults and juveniles. Since 2000, there has been a steady increase in gang membership and in gang-related crime and violence (Dinkes, Cataldi, Kena et al., 2006). Faced with increasingly limited resources, many communities are struggling to address this problem. Although there are numerous multi-strategy, community-level programs attempting to address gang issues, there is a need for rigorous evaluations to determine program efficacy. NIJ seeks evaluations—using the most appropriate and rigorous methods—that examine gang prevention and/or intervention programs.

For detailed information about this opportunity please see the full solicitation (NIJ-2010-2428). To find more opportunities from this agency, please see here.
